Bernier debate performance

Toronto – It was a night full of zingers, blunders and more than a little shouting. But who won the first official leaders debate? Political pundits are divided. Many say NDP Leader Jagmeet Singh belonged to the night with a relaxed tone and clear arguments. Others are giving victory to Liberal leader Justin Trudeau and Conservative Leader Conservative Scheer, claiming that both are keeping their ground against attack attacks. With two weeks to go before election day, here's how the leaders fared. LIBERAL LEADER JUSTIN TRUDEAU Trudeau went to the debate with a bulls-eye on his back and a litany of uncomfortable topics to deal with: the SNC-Lavalin affair, his decision to stand with the Nova Scotia candidate despite sexist tweets, and photos that appeared to him in blackface and brownface. That saw Trudeau's former political rival Tom Mulcair say the Liberal leader came out of the debate as a winner. I think clearly Justin Trudeau, once again, because no one could score a knockout, comes forward on the point, but I think Andrew Scheer was very close to second. Mulcair, a former NDP leader, told CTV News Channel after the debate. Trudeau was largely on the defensive all night as other leaders went after his record on everything from climate change to pipelines to indigenous affairs. For his part, Trudeau explained his government's achievements clearly and succinctly, often as a list. He also didn't get flustered, said Aleem Kanji, a non-partisan strategist and vice president of government relations at The Sutherland Corporation. He did not wind the bat of much mud that was thrown at him during this debate, Kanji said. Replay: Watch the full leaderboard here, the Liberal leader landed one of the night's fastest single-liners, which was more than a one-two punch. Addressing People's Party leader Maxime Bernier, whose views have been called nationalistic and xenophobic, Trudeau likened him to Conservative Leader Andrew Scheer. Your role at this stage seems to be to say publicly what Mr. Scheer thinks privately, Trudeau said. Mulcair also credited Trudeau for taking a position on Bill 21, a recently passed, popular law in Quebec that prohibits public employees from positions in the office of authorities wearing religious dresses such as a turban or hijab. Trudeau said he was the only one on the scene who would say yes, the federal government could have intervened on it. He accused Singh of leaving the door open for a challenge. I think it was the most prime ministerial moment for Justin Trudeau when he said he was ready to fight it, Mulcair said. It will cost him in Quebec, Mulcair added. But I also think people in the rest of Canada will recognize that the answer is whatever they can identify with. Evan Solomon, host of CTV Question Period, said Trudeau had a low-key approach that would cost him. Trudeau thought, hey, I'm prime minister, I'm historic, I'm going to be above the fray, he said. The problem of whether he risked overshadowing Liberal strategist Jennifer Arp said that Trudeau rose to the occasion, but she doubts that any leader was convincing enough to win over the undecided voters. He focused on what the government has done over the last four years; He tried as best as he could to stay out of the fray, despite constant attacks on Mr. Scheer in particular, she said. So I thought he had a great, great night last night. CONSERVATIVE LEADER ANDREW SCHEER Scheer aimed to position himself as the best alternative to Trudeau, while painting the Liberal government as a concern of communicating with everyday Canadians. And he came out swinging. Asked how he'd defend Canada's values on the world stage, Scheer quickly turned to attack Trudeau. He accused Trudeau of wearing a feminist mask and middle-class mask and called him a phoner who didn't deserve to govern his country. Scheer's sharp-tongued response was picked up by Green Party Leader Elizabeth May, who said she'd like to answer the Canadian values question, unlike what we just heard. Solomon said that Scheer's combative knife was a big risk. Mr. Scheer is actually a very likeable guy, but he decided to get rid of the holes and go in an angry suit, Solomon said. It is now a very controversial strategy. Guerrillas like it – but can he grow his base? So it was his gamble. Conservative strategist Jason Lieteaer agreed that it was a gamble, but he believes it paid off. The reason why I liked the gamble, it was a calculated gamble, that is: many people tune out of the debate after the first kind of 15 or 20 minutes, he said. For better or worse, I would say that the clip drove a lot of news coverage because it happened so early in the debate that people were able to build their stories around it. CTV News political commentator Scott Reid, a former speechwriter under former Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin, said Scheer had a rocky performance. I think Scheer had a rough night. I think he couldn't get traction, I think he was on the attack a lot, Reid said. Kanji agreed. I think we saw Mr. Scheer, who really lacked passion. It didn't come out. 7 takeaways from the federal leaders debate Adrienne Batra, editor-in-chief of the Toronto Sun, Scheer landed one of the night's strongest lines when he pointed out the number of times Trudeau mentioned Ontario Premier Doug Ford. Mr. Trudeau, you seem strangely obsessed with provincial politics. There is a vacancy in the Ontario Liberal leadership and if you are so focused on provincial politics, go and run the leadership of that party, Scheer said. In one of his softer moments, Scheer lauded Singh for handling issues in the race with much of the class during the campaign, seemingly pointing to his private conversation with Trudeau after the brown face scandal. Scheer has consistently polled behind Trudeau as the preferred Minister. In the next few days, keep a close eye on Nanos Research numbers to see if this gap closes. GREEN PARTY LEADER ELIZABETH MAY has openly said that she does not expect the Greens to form a government, so her goal was to position her party as best suited to hold the ruling party accountable, especially when it comes to climate change. As the most experienced federal politician on stage, often came across as clear and controlling. At some point in the debate on the economy, May turned to discuss health care - prompting other leaders to follow suit. As for the environment, May repeatedly broke into other parties' platforms because it is not good enough to meet the global environmental crisis. At one point, May confronted Trudeau directly on the liberal climate plan. It's not good enough to have better rhetoric than Mr. Scheer, she said. Don Martin, host of CTV's Power Play, said May was extremely strong on climate change - an issue that voters have identified as their main concern in this election. Elizabeth May, if you want to talk about climate change, she was hammering home better than anyone about it, Martin said. But Solomon suggested that May left the debate in no better position than when she walked. I don't think she helped or hurt herself, he said. One of her most memorable points was when she laze at Scheer for his personal views on abortion. Scheer has said that he is personally opposed to abortion, but will not open the national debate on the issue. And I think at the moment that Elizabeth may wheeled at her and said, No inches, we can't trust you about women's choices, I think that's the kind of thing – unlike many of the things we've heard – that could move votes, Reid said. NDP LEADER JAGMEET SINGH After months of dismal polls for the NDP, Singh had a high bar at night: persuading left-leaning voters that they should vote for him instead of Trudeau. If one thing is certain, Singh came across as the most relaxed in this debate. He drew laughs several times, including once when he mistakenly called Mr. Scheer. I wore a bright orange turban with a purpose today! he said, drawing laughter from the crowd. If there was a winner tonight, Batra said it would be Singh – narrowly. No one had a big win tonight, but I'm going to give a small edge to Mr. Singh tonight. I think he articulated himself quite clearly. He started out a bit tense, but freed up. He went after Justin Trudeau on indigenous issues. He was able to go after Justin Trudeau on a lot of social issues – areas where that progressive left vote would look like the NDP and think, well, I'm happy with that, she said. I think it was a Singh-Scheer show tonight. Solomon agreed that Singh was standing alone. He had some good zingers, but he thought, you know what, there's not much depth in this debate, there's too little time. I'm going to go get So he was quite likeable, and he is widely seen has won the debate. His problem is there's less than two weeks left. Is there enough runway to actually make up the ground? Singh also made a powerful one-two punch against Scheer and Trudeau when discussing climate change policies. I want to say it directly to Canadians, you don't need to choose between Mr. Delay and Mr. Deny. There is another option, Singh said. NDP commentator Tom Parkin said Singh's presence on stage will be remembered. He had a presence on stage that was quite commanding, but others were constantly over-talking, Jagmeet sometimes turn to the camera and talk to people about their problems, and I think it really matters that he tried to make a connection and prove his point... that he does not work rich and powerful, Parkin said. In recent weeks, polls have shown a neck-and-neck race between the Greens and the NDP. Singh may have set the best tone and give some bite-sized moments perfect for social media, but Kanji doubts it will be enough to turn the tide where the NDP needs the most: Quebec. I don't see the NDP picking up support and seats in Quebec, he said. FOR PEOPLE'S PARTY LEADER MAXIME BERNIER For Bernier, the debate was all about stealing the spotlight from Scheer. Polls show that the newly formed People's Party , formed after Bernier's unsuccessful bid for the Conservative leadership, is only competitive in a handful of e-udes. If Bernier has any chance of building official party status, he will need to win the right-leaning seat of the Conservatives. Overall, Bernier did little to reach across the aisle and try to invite new voters under his party's tent. He opened the night by saying he would put Canada first, reflecting U.S. President Donald Trump's America First policy. At one point, he compared the approach of May's spending to the political turmoil in Venezuela. Debate body language: An expert breaks down party leaders' nonverbly nuances Singh gave a sharp rebuke at the beginning of the debate as he defended his position that Bernier would never have been invited to attend. After a few minutes of this debate tonight, I think people can clearly understand why I don't think you should deserve a platform, Singh said. If there was a loser at the debate, Martin says, it was Bernier. He seemed to talk too much and had positions that were out of sorts, he said. BLOCCOIS QUEBEC LEADER YVES-FRANCOIS BLANCHET English language debate will never be if Blanchet won over the electorate. His campaign slogan is Le Quebec, C'est nous – or Quebec, it's us – and his party platform includes a focus on protecting Quebec's sovereignty and language. Even so, Blanchet had a clear mission in the English language debate: persuading voters in Quebec to elect their party over liberals who continue to lead the polls in the French-speaking province. Blanchet was a fervent supporter of Quebec values, standing up in support of Bill 21. He also aimed at the Quebec he accused of not doing enough about climate change. Someone who invokes the truth should n't be someone denying climate change, he said. Martin said Blanchet's performance would never be the main event, but he spoke to his audience. I don't know if Blanchet had much to win over English Canada, but that wasn't the goal to use. He plays with one province audience, Martin said. Blanchet's real test will be Thursday, when six federal leaders face off on another French-language debate. SO WHO WON? Political pundits are divided on who won, with most saying no leader can claim victory. The Toronto Star Editorial Board wrote that the debate saw no one immediately emerge as the clear winner. Trudeau had tried to stay above the fray by adopting a measured and sometimes strangely low-key position, but late at night exhibited more fire, The Star wrote. The Globe and Mail editorial board wrote that the leaders' debate rarely delivers a knockout blow, and this year's contest was no exception. However, Globe credited Singh with a strong night. He entered this election in deep trouble, with the Greens and BQ similarly threatening to eat what remains of his voting base. But on Monday night, he appeared most happy and relaxed from the candidates, often accurate in his attacks on Mr. Trudeau, and was able to joke about the fact that he was three different times known as Mr. Scheer, The Globe wrote. Globe journalist John Ibbotson went a step further, praising Singh for the pitch-perfect positive message, but somehow sings to close every vote raised against him. On Monday, Mr. Scheer gambled gambled that a full-on attack on the same above the debate could change the slide. More often than not, he pulled it off Mr. Trudeau to regret his cautious approach. But if the night belonged to someone, it belonged to Jagmeet Singh, he wrote. in Quebec, La Presse journalist Joel-Denis Bellavance wrote that it is unlikely that little will change in the polls after Monday's performance. He credited Trudeau for defending his record over the past four years and stirring up the bogeyman of Stephen Harper's Conservative years. Bellavance agreed that Singh delivered a strong performance, writing that he undoubtedly scored valuable points that would support him going into election day. Ottawa Citizen's Gloria Galloway crowned Singh the winner of the night, with a close second in May. Both answered questions directly without converting each answer into a personal attack, she wrote. Postmedia's Christie Blatchford claimed there was no clear winner. But, in her view, Trudeau was a clear loser. She described the Liberal leader as gray, uncomfortable and sweaty from the start and said he struggled without a teleprompter. Voters will decide who will run the country October 21st. Whether tonight's performance moves needle remains to be seen, but Kanji doesn't expect a breakout moment. I'm not sure anyone won this debate, and I hope the polls will remain tight over Thanksgiving weekend, and as we lead into the election, he said. Said.
